What happens after I make a call?

When a call about possible abuse or neglect is received, adult protective services central intake staff members:

- Review your concern by asking screening questions to determine if the adult is in serious danger and needs immediate intervention (such as law enforcement).
- When appropriate, provide assistance to help individuals gain access to services by providing information and referring people to appropriate services.
- If a report meets the criteria for further evaluation, information is sent to regional staff who conduct a home visit to do a full assessment and make appropriate referrals or provide follow-up as needed.

What else should I know after I call with a concern?

- A person, including a vulnerable adult, has the right to make his or her own decisions unless the person gives up that right or the court system gives that responsibility to someone else.
- A person, including a vulnerable adult, has the right to live how he or she wants if it does not harm others or involve a crime.
- If a vulnerable adult who is subject to abuse or neglect is unable to consent to and accept adult protective services, or if that vulnerable adult's caregiver refuses adult protective services, the department can independently pursue legal action necessary to protect the vulnerable adult from further abuse or neglect.
